

Two-Foot-High Dollhouse

It was made as "found art" from the sidewalks of Philadelphia in the 1980s and designed to be disassembled and put into a small briefcase out of the way.

After initially finding the black boards, the rule was that everything had to be found on the street -- except for some glue, some wood stain for the hinged kitchen cabinets, and a little grout for the floor "tiles" in the dining area. These low-resolution snapshots from the days before digital are now the only proof that it ever existed.
